The epic poem, written in the early 14th century, is an allegory representing the soul's ascent to God. Dante is guided on his journey through Hell and Heaven by Beatrice, the woman to whom the poet dedicated most of his poetry and almost all of his life, from his first sight of her at the age of nine. She is his intercessor in Inferno, his goal while travelling through Purgatorio, and his guide through Paradiso, where she ascends to her place in heaven.

No. of pages: 96

The author writes:

“Bunches of words like the ones in these collections are usually called Blackout Poems or Erasure Poems, because you can make them by taking an existing text and blacking out the words and letters you don’t want. I like to call them Embedded Poems, because the words that appeal to me are already there, hidden away, embedded, waiting for me and others to discover. With ‘blackout’ you cover up and obscure, with ‘embedded’ you reveal. Same result, perhaps, but a different attitude to the process.

This is a game that anyone can play. The texts I’ve chosen to work with are all the opening pages of well-known novels, but you can take any texts - newspaper articles, shopping lists, advertisements, celebrities’ tweets, school text books, technical manuals - and have fun searching for words and phrases that resonate particularly with you.”

The artist writes:

“I caught the drawing and painting bug very late in life. The studies in these volumes all emerged during two years of study under a local artist's tutelage in my early 70s. Most are drawn with chalk pastels on coloured paper, some are painted with acrylics and there are some that are created or at least manipulated on the computer.

The point of collecting them into book form is so that the originals, which take up an enormous amount of space, can be thrown away, or perhaps even be reused by others who have caught the bug.”
